We are always careful to note how interesting the always-amusing National Broadcasting and Telecommunications Commission (NBTC) is. In their tradition of always out-doing their last strange act, the commission's honcho asked the World Health Organisation if the radiation from the cell towers causes cancer. Fascinating Takorn Tantasith, pretending to be, or (who knows?) possibly unaware of the impossibility of proving a negative, said it was simple. The WHO should clarify just what harm — if any harm — occurs from being near the "electromagnetic fields emitted by base stations". WHO says emissions might be carcinogenic. Or maybe not, because there's no shred of actual proof they are. But it has been proved the NBTC is entertaining.
